

ABSTRACT

Historically most societies have displayed abhorrence towards sexual offenders. The reaction in many instances has been increasingly punitive laws. Most of these laws remain today even though they are manifestly outdated, primitive and unworkable.

Nevertheless, the volume of sexual crimes has been increasing as the laws refuse to accommodate the socio-psychological factors involved in the problem. Urgent legal reform along these lines and in other areas, is needed.