

Abstract

Problem Statement: The impact of rising food prices on households in Trinidad and Tobago

The elementary focus of the study was the impacts of rising food prices on households in Trinidad and Tobago. The area of Trinidad that the study was centered around was Couva, located in the central region of the country. The study looked at fifty (50) households of different sizes, age of participants, household income and genders.

To assemble the information required a questionnaire was administered to the participants. The questionnaire was structured to focus on specific aspects such as their opinions on whether there was a price increase and also on broad aspects such as general information about their household. When the data was gathered from all fifty participants, it was analyzed in the form of graphs and discussed in detail throughout the body of the project.
