

Abstract

In this study, the price competitiveness of local pork production is evaluated in relative terms to imported US and Canadian wholesale prices. The border price, producer and consumer benefit are the predominant focus in order to determine the price competitiveness of the domestic industry. According to the results, pork imported from US and Canada is more price competitive to local pork. The government must implement a policy intervention strategy so as to protect the local industry from cheap imports.