ABSTRACT

Juvenile Delinquency: A Student Video Production Experience.

Bruce Rodney Paddington

The experience of student video production in a Form Four Social Studies class, on the topic of juvenile delinquency, was investigated using ethnographic methods. A class of eighteen 14 – 15 year old boys and girls, in a Senior Comprehensive School in Trinidad and Tobago, were exposed to the use of a video camera as a means of observation, recording interviews and data collection, in order to acquire a greater understanding of juvenile delinquency. The class project included classroom activities and field visits. The students were divided into groups and identified places to visit and persons to interview using video equipment. Having completed the field visits, the material was reviewed, appropriate sequences selected and a presentation made.

The students' activities were recorded and analysed through participant observation and qualitative evaluation techniques, using still photography and audio and videotape recordings.

The students developed many skills during this study. They collected data, organized and analysed information, selected material and presented the results in a comprehensive manner. They became aware of the role of the media in defining evidence, and gained proficiency in video production skills. They demonstrated a high degree of self-motivation, responsibility and confidence. Working in groups they showed co-operation and leadership skills.

He also wishes to thank: the Ministry of Education, especially Clive Norby and Dr. Claudia Harvey, Bernice Boyce and Jeannette Pilgrin for her typing services and my wife and children for their patience and support.

The study would not have been possible without the generosity of the class teacher and eighteen 14 - 15 year old students, who let a stranger enter their world. They treated me both as a professional and as a friend, and allowed me to observe and record their problems and triumphs over a three week period. Finally, I wish to thank all those who so willingly participated in the class project: the Police Superintendent, the Senior Comprehensive Principal, the Sisters at the Orphanage and the Home for Girls, the Guidance officer, 'John Public', Teachers, Students and Guest Evaluators.
