ACKNOWLEDGEMENTS

The research involved in this thesis has been the fruit of the labours of many. I owe a great debt to my parents who have been helpful and supportive throughout the course of my efforts. This assistance has not been limited to fellow members of the diaspora whom I have had the pleasure of meeting, as well as the recognition that migrants have awarded me by virtue of being the son of Suzanne and John.

To Richard, Minette and Corrine, who have generously assisted me with the sourcing of research publications that I would have otherwise been unable to obtain, I am quite grateful. I must record my profound thanks to Lisa as one who has patiently and lovingly borne with my excessive scholarly activities, for all of my issues as I have them. My constant Chinese Teacher and Friend, Mr. Wang, is especially grateful to Lisa's patience, Donald and Uncle Ken.

Those at the Institute of International Relations who have contributed to the emergence of this thesis, in one form or fashion, include Dr. André-Vincent Henry and the late Dr. Herbert Addo. Of course, I am most indebted to Dr. Keith Nurse, the supervisor who has assisted me in bringing this thesis to the light of day who has challenged me to extend my intellectual horizons during the course of this project.

To Mr. Frank Clarke, who assisted me in providing valuable research materials and references, I am grateful. I cannot fail to mention all the members of the teaching staff, and the students who have helped me, in one way or another, that have contributed to my overall understanding of the subject.

I shall forever remain in debt to the late Dr. D. Baptiste whose words of encouragement during the early stages of this work I value. I shall also forever remain in debts to the late Dr. D. Baptiste whose works of encouragement during the early stages of this work I value.

DIASPORA AND TRANSNATIONALISM:
THE CASE OF
THE CHINESE IN TRINIDAD AND TOBAGO

Winston Gregory O’Young

The mass movements of populations across continents and overseas that have given rise to an array of diaspora constitute a phenomenon that has taken place across historical time and throughout geographical space. In this research several of these diasporas are highlighted and some of their more characteristic features profiled.

The Chinese Diaspora, in particular, is analysed against the background of its historical evolution. The physical extent of the diaspora and its economic, political and social dimensions are sketched.

The focus of this thesis is on a transnational analysis of that portion of the Chinese Diaspora to be found in Trinidad and Tobago. Such a transnational perspective entails consideration of both state and non-state actors in the development of relations between states. In subjecting the relations between Trinidad and Tobago and the People’s Republic of China to such a study, attention is paid to the arrival, settlement and establishment of the Chinese community in this island. The demographic traits of the Chinese population are also studied, while selected migrant interviews are included.

Evidence is taken from the political, economic and social spheres of interactions between the People’s Republic of China and Trinidad and Tobago to demonstrate that the diaspora of Chinese in this country has contributed, in no small measure, to the development of relations between the two states.
