

ABSTRACT

All operations in the harvesting of Elephant grass can be mechanized with a consequent reduction in time and man-power requirements but only in the case of cutting costs did this prove economical. Land surface characteristics have a direct bearing on the efficiency and economics of mechanical harvesting methods.